ORDRANCE ORDERA—The sad intelligence of the death of Brigadier General George C. Strong, an officer of this Department, results the memory and renews the affliction of the double bercavement which the Ordnance Corps specially has been called upon, in a brief period, to lears and lament. First Reno, and now Strong, both so well known to their corps, and so highly appreciated for the intelligence, real, and devotion which each brought to the discharge of the particular aphere of duty of his own branch of the service—so less arduous and important through less brilliant and striking in than that of the battle-field—has each crowned his career and naished his course, as a patriot and soldier ought, in the seal of his life-blood, set to devotion to his country. Both have set a glorous example in their lives and in their deaths, which will ever endear their memories to their corps: while it should serve as an example and incentive to all it as deal and eight and services.
